Gary,

My search into Kabbalah is very limited to what I can understand. And what I can understand is limited to the lessons that I have learned by facing my tests in life.

It is in this that I can use it to define my truths. My truths are what I learned to be true. I realized that I have been listening for other people's truths instead of listening to myself.

One of the videos gave the analogy of tuning a radio to the right frequency to hear it; the tests are there to refine us and to bring us to a place of being ready to listen for the next challenge.

"So with all your introspection you are still having the gall to eat stuff that once had a pulse and should you think it smart to now open a debate about a blade of grass having some feint pulse that you and I have yet to detect and that at a minimum it still has DNA then I suggest you jump on a plane right this very minute and join a Jewish missionary in Jerusalem and then have this knuckleheads join me in this "real time" debate."

I understand the importance of not drinking the glass of water with pasta...

...which is why I can no longer eat meat as it would be lying to myself in knowing there are healthier alternatives and still choosing to hurt my body by eating it.

The world is getting bigger and smaller everyday.

The reason that I say that Kabbalah will be a guiding beacon is because this compassion that you speak of can only be reached when you can look beyond problems and mistakes and see them as nothing more than a decision of right and wrong.

I now feel the pain that you wanted me to feel. I don't feel it for the surface reasons, but for the missed opportunity to chose right and learn as in every person.

The core messages that I took from my exploration into Kabbalah was that life is an opportunity to rise to our challenges and learn; it then becomes another test to apply what you learn to yourself. If I know that processed food is bad for me and I chose to eat it, I am proving with my actions that I am not ready for my next test... I have not earned the right to see the next truth.

If you apply this logic to people it is affirmation of the adage, "you can lead a horse to water, but you can't make him drink."

We have put the truth out there, but people have to be ready to see it as truth... this they have to earn. And it has to be earned in the same way you made me earn it by not allowing me to lie to myself... you wouldn't let me talk shit to myself and that forced me to listen.

It was not lost on me that one of the main Kabbalist was a heavy man. He is selectively choosing which of the his truths to listen to. It was my test to see that.

The Solana Beach 24hr does not have showers to my knowledge, they are a very small.

let me know, If there is anything that I can help with during your travels.
